PREFACE.

THE compiler of the following pages intended a much larger work than the present; but being discouraged from executing his design, by the high price of paper and printing, he resolved, in the mean time, to publish an abridgement for the use of learners: and, to render it useful also to more advanced Students, he has intermingled a fuller explication of such words, as appeared most important or difficult. Afraid however of increasing the book too much, he at first enlarged on very few words.—For the sake of brevity, the infinitive of easy verbs is only inserted, and the nouns derived from them, when the meaning is obvious, are marked by contraction: so likewise adverbs derived from adjectives and participles. These and other such abbreviations will be easily understood by the reader, who is supposed to be previously acquainted with the principles of grammar. The present of the infinitive, rather than the first person of the present of the indicative, is inserted, as answering best to the English, and because from it derivatives are usually formed. When there is any difficulty in the conjugation of a verb, its preterite and supine are marked; except in those compound verbs, which agree in conjugation with their primitives. A few names of gems, plants, insects, &c. which rarely occur, are omitted.

The compiler perceiving, as he proceeded, the utility of more copious illustrations, and that most of them might be included within moderate bounds, introduced them afterwards more frequently; and, in the latter part of the book, has enlarged almost on every word according to its importance: on several of them, nearly as much as he proposed in his larger work. He has endeavoured carefully to distinguish the different meanings of words, and to explain them by the most pertinent examples. When the various significations of a word could not easily be reduced to distinct heads, he has, with much pains, arranged the examples alphabetically.—In order to connect the knowledge of words and things together, whenever a beautiful moral sentiment occurred, or an allusion is made to a remarkable custom, to an historical fact, or the like, the whole sentence is transcribed, and if difficult, explained. When the example refers to any thing of great importance, it is farther illustrated by quoting similar passages from various authors. On this part of the work the compiler has bestowed the utmost attention, and hopes it will be found useful to readers of every description. Any one, who takes the trouble of examining ing only a few of the words, on which he has enlarged, and of comparing them with those in Ainsworth, or indeed in any other dictionary the compiler has met with, will perceive the pains he has taken, and how much still remains to be done, to facilitate the perusal of the Latin classic authors. If the public approve of the specimen, which he has here given, he will endeavour to compleat his larger work to the best of his ability.

He has, as usual, borrowed with freedom from all hands, whatever he judged fit for his purpose. To enumerate the various authors, he has consulted, would be tedious and useless. He has been indebted chiefly to Cooper and Ainsworth, to Gesner's edition of R. Stephani Thesaurus, to the Lexicon of Facciolati and Forcellini, to the Indexes of Barmannus, Cellarius, Ernesti, the editors of the classics ad usum Delphini, &c.

The diphthongs ae, and oe, are printed without contraction, as they are found in ancient manuscripts, and as they are printed by several of the best modern editors, Gesner, Ernesti, Heyne, Jani, &c.—The compiler proposed to have joined two Appendices, of proper names; the one containing the names of places; and the other of persons: but that being impracticable in this volume, he must refer the reader, for information on those subjects, to his Geographical Index, and Classical Biography.

It is now near four years, since the printing of this book was begun; which delay has been occasioned by the difficulty of the work, and by making various alterations and additions.—Great care has been taken to correct the press; and considering the minute nature of the work, it is hoped that few typographical mistakes of any consequence will be found. For this, as for other favours, the compiler is much indebted to a friend, distinguished for his classical taste and accuracy, Professor Dalzel, who has been so obliging, as to read over with critical attention, all the sheets as they were printed, except a few: and he embraces, with great pleasure, this opportunity of acknowledging his obligations to that learned gentleman, for his kind assistance in revising and correcting occasionally all his former works, for above thirty years.

Particular attention has been paid to mark with accuracy the quotations from the classics, and from the best editions.—The editions of prose authors most frequently consulted, are the following; Cicero, by Ernesti and Verburgius: in Cicero's epistles ad Familiares, when the epistle is long, the subdivisions are marked from the edition of Cortius:—so in Pliny's epistles, from the editions of Cellarius, Cortius and Longolius: Livy, by Drackenborch, Ruddiman, Crevier, and Ernesti;—Sallust, by Cortius: Caesar, Cornelius Nepos, Florus, and Justin, ad usum Delphini: Velleius Paterculus, cum notis Variorum:—Tacitus, by Brotier, and Ernesti:—Cato, Varro, Columella, and the other writers de re rustica, by Gesner:—Suctonius, by Pitiscus, aud Ernesti:—Quinctilian, by Gesner:—Celsus, by Targa, with the excellent Index, of G. Matthias:—Pliny, by Franzius, Leipsic, 1778; and by Brotier, Paris, 1779. As this author has been very often quoted, not only the books and chapters, but likewise the section, and sometimes also the subdivisions of the section, according to Hardouin, are marked.

The

The editions of the poets, which have been chiefly consulted, are, Plautus, by Gronovius and Ernesti; Terence, by Westerhovius; Lucretius, by Creech; Virgil, by Ruaeus, and Heyne; Horace, by Gesner, and Jani; Ovid, by Knippingius, and Burmannus; Tibullus, by Broukhusius; Catullus and Propertius, by Vulpius; Lucan, by Cortius, et cum notis Variorum; Juvenal and Persius, ad usum Delphini; Silius Italicus, by Cellarius; Martial, ad usum Delphini, et cum notis Variorum, &c.

The following abbreviations and marks are often used; m. for the middle; f. for finis, the end; v. for vel, or for verse; f. for seu, or for section; vid. for vide, see; q. v. for quod vide, which see; i. e. for id est, that is; cf. for confer or conferas, compare:—A. for Roman Antiquities; G. for Geography, &c.—* before a word denotes it to be of Greek origin: * before a sentence, shews that it deserves to be remarked: † before a word, denotes that it is used only by the Poets.
